"Hearts of Erin." With his lyric tenor voice, robust and vet canary-sweet. Walter Scanlan charmed the audience which gathered at Shubert-Belasco Theater last evening for the opening per-formance of "Hearts of Erin." All his songs, written and composed by himself, have the traditional Irish nimself, have the traditional Irish ring, and are sung with the broad Erin accent that carries out the spirit of the sentiments and of the settings. Each has a swinging melody, and the humming of tunes by some in the audience as they left the theater gave ample testimony that they were liked.

Scanlan's opening song, "I'd Love to Scanlan's opening song, "I'd Love to Harra an Irish Song," was one of the most pleasing of the group of seven rendered during the evening. nimself a warm friend.

A rousing burlesque show of two acts and five scenes, entitled "Hurly Burly," with a good cast of principals and a chorus of pretty girls, holds the boards at the Capitol Theater this week. Joe Wilton wrote the book and lyrics and does a large share of the funmaking. He is ably assisted by Jim Bennett as Isadore Cohen. They have a new line of talk which makes the audience laugh. Photoplay Features.

"Over the Hill."

William Fox has scored a triumph in his picture production of Will Carleton's poems, "Over the Hill to the Poorhouse" and "Over the Hill From the Poorhouse." The audience which filled the Stubert-Garrick last night saw the soul of the poet and the mas-ter hand of the modern film market ter hand of the modern film market at once. The result was a story of the intimate joys and sorrows of the mother who all her life thought first of her family of six boya and girls. The play is based on poems published years ago in "Farm Pallads." Mother love is shown in a way which first stirs the audience to laughter by the wild and careless acand then brings tears even to the blase theater attendant when the tale unfolds. Mary Carr, as "Ma Benton," in the character which draws one back to the days when mother did everything for us kids and did it all day and most of the night. Her love day and most of the night. Her love is unshaken when disgrace comes to the family, and with old age the kids who have married and have youngsters of their own leave her to battle uncomplainingly with their neglect—that is, all but the "wild" boy, the black sheep "John." John Walker portrays the part finely.

He it is who goes to prison for the weak father and who returns at the end of the sentence to take up life in a new locality. He sends money to care for the mother to his brother Isaac, who keeps it and finally allows the sweet old woman to go from his day and most of the night. Her love

Isaac, who keeps it and finally allows the sweet old woman to go from his home "Over the Hill to the Poorhouse." When John finally returns to learn why he has not heard from mother his brother's perfidy is revealed to him, and then comes the exciting scenes of the play until John drives his mother back to the home in which he spent his early days. A family reconciliation follows.

The acting, especially of the children in the prologue, is excellent. Mary Carr and Vivienne Osborne, the latter as John's faithful sweetheart, win the audience from the beginning. Sheridan Tansey plays the part of the son, who always quotes the Scriptures to John and who meets with his displeasure in after years. "Over the Hill" seems destined to run as long here as it did in New York.

"The Faith Healer."

Persons who are afflicted with maginary ills may find some measure imaginary ills may find some measure of comfort in the film, "The Faith Healer," which was shown in Washington for the first time last night at the Columbia Theater. It might be added in all fairness, however, that this picture requires honest thought to prevent misconstruction.

In it Milton Sills is pictured as a man whose unflinching belief in the power of God enables him to accomplish what appear to be miracles. As a matter of fact the healer's inspired faith and personal magnetism

While strongly melodramatic, the story, with many thrilling scenes, furnishes enjoyable entertainment. pretty love story, hinging around the return of a far-traveled heir to Dromana Castle to claim his estates from black schemers and to find, in addition, the girl of his dreams living in the lodge. The dark plots of Martin Burke, with several accomplices, serve to develop melodramatic moments, the young hero arriving each time at the right minute to save his sweetheart and the all-important treasure box.

Several members of the company contribute effective bits of acting. Charles V. Dingle makes Martin Burke properly disagreeable and Lawrence C. O'Brien and Dan Kelly furnish much laughter during the performance. Olive Moore has the role of Nora, daughter of the dead lodgekeeper and the colleen with whom the new master of the estate falls in love.

"Black Beauty."

"Black Beauty."

"Black Beauty," the classic story of the horse, by Anna Sewell, has been woven into a splendid screen story, which is shown at the Rialto this week. The house was crowded to the doors throughout the afternoon and evening. "Black Beauty" proper is confined to the outdoor life in the country, but interest is added to the screen production by a tale of the "humans" carried through house interiors, which rounds out the picture in the true movie style. Black Beauty and Ginger excite the same heart interest that develop in the reading of the book, and Jean Paige as Jessie has the proverbial struggle with the villain before finally landing in the arms of the man she loves. Remarkable scenes are shown in the race for the station, when the lover, on Black Beauty, has to ascend a bank and Crandall's Theater, in response to
